

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC

Table of Contents

FOREIGN	1
Home School.....	2
Old Man of the Mountain	5
Book.....	7
Slash and Burn	10
Mango	12
Maji ni Moja	14
Cattle Post.....	17
Intending to Write	18
Félicitation	20
Dimensional Shift	21
Clearing Bush.....	23
Ras Tanura Terminal.....	25
00:30	28
DOMESTIC	29
In the Headlights	30
Thanksgiving.....	31
Follow Me.....	33
Family Picnic	35
Boots	36
The Guitar in Blow-Up	37
The Blue.....	39
Drone.....	41
Children’s Crusade.....	43
Lost	45
Bodhisattvas Contemplate	47
The Cloud.....	49
No Poem Today	52
Not Creative	53

FOREIGN

Home School

Video

We lived in a fantasy of brick terraces and reflecting pools marble fountains and darting fish beneath lofty cypresses and cedars, hopping irrigation ditches from pomegranate to orange grove rose bush to pansy bed, squeezing the jaws of snapdragons just to hear them roar.

Outside the walls a feudal monarchy catapulted into the twentieth century by petrodollars, Anglo- American imperialism and naked ambition, a bedlam of wildcatters and con men elbowing past long-sleeved clerics, big-finned Chevys blaring around donkey carts, a cacophony of medieval poetry and early rock and roll.

Inside a life of calm and comfort coffee tables strewn with Look and Life, a waffle iron for Sunday breakfast, a wringer washing machine that had to be pounded back into shape after it fell off the top of the truck when the goat hair rope broke, couches and chairs, a dining set, dressers and beds, a cook, and a fully stocked pantry.

A good education was paramount to first generation college graduates, so every morning my sister and I would mount the steep mud brick steps to a classroom equipped with steel desks imported from our Iowa school district, chant “Good morning, Mrs. Ramsay,” and pledge allegiance to the 48-star flag in the corner.

At first we picked up where we left off in the workbooks we’d brought from home.
When the correspondence courses arrived, we followed their spiral-bound guides through stacks of textbooks carefully selected to provide fully accredited American schooling anywhere in the hinterland they decide to send us.

Gradually we dropped the pretense of calling my mother “Mrs. Ramsay,” and I discovered the joy of working ahead at my own pace as long as I took the tests and quizzes in time.
I particularly liked the history course, tracking the sequence of historic events on a timeline attached to the chalk tray.

Then one day I added a name that sounded familiar.
Cyrus the Great, king of the Persians.
Didn’t we visit his tomb just the other day on our trip to Persepolis?
Pasargadae, some really ruined ruins, not much to see there but a stone shed atop a pyramid, yet now I had a connection between that spot and an abstract dot on my timeline, and it all began to fit together.
The walls were about to tumble.

Swiveling in my seat feet firmly on the classroom floor my mind could wander aimlessly out the window into the garden soaring over the walls, the Koran gate, the poets' tombs, the barren mountain passes, the crumbling palaces of ancient kings, pipelines and platforms, seeing the world on a magic carpet of opportunity.

Outside the walls I was free to learn from tracing airline flight paths at a window seat, adult conversations around a restaurant table, our Anglican vicar's translations of ancient inscriptions, our house guest's experiences living among the nomads, lying on our backs outside the satellite tracking station, acquiring other languages by making up our own, reading license plates to master the real Arabic numerals.

And inside was still safe at home.
I'd dreamed of tunneling under the wall to escape the chafing safety and security of learning from home, to embrace the unpredictable.
Now I can appreciate the disabling price that outside forces exact, leaving one capable only of survival and nostalgia for the happy days of being schooled at home.

Old Man of the Mountain

Mysterious walled-in garden on the hillside reportedly haunted by Sufi mystics heretic hashish dervishes twirling far beyond the range of our satellite tracking station high upon another hill

Tall cypresses and cedars just visible behind their garden wall hinted at ancient beds of roses and a long reflecting pool where the faithful recline and contemplate the orbits of the sun and stars

I dreamt of sneaking out disguised as a child beggar tunneling under the wall guarding our immunity scaling the wall protecting them in their infamy

I'd become invisible, an agent of deception in their order of assassins stealing through bazaar stalls concealed in a whiff of incense whisking past the unsuspecting dagger under my cloak

Divested of my pretense I'd be immediately arrested and sentenced to my parents once again a foreigner, a guest of this country heedless of the traditions I was trampling

Or perhaps I'd have made a friend inside the garden who'd one day remember the courage of the young farangi who'd jumped the wall and done their bidding just because he was curious

Book

Grandmother used to say that each of us has a book inside compiled of all the stories heard round the fire a book of ancestors and events and the various forces that play upon us, forest animals and spirits living and dead, battles fought, lost and won, and explanations of every kind told over and over so we never forget.

This book we take with us wherever we go, adding to it and embellishing here and there building it up inside us until the spirit moves and spills it out to intersect with other books at the appropriate time passing on to our children, our wives and husbands, our parents, our friends, appended to their books for better or for worse.

Some of us were running from those who say books are bad that there is but one book for everyone because too many books make you doubt the One, but the rest of us say the more books the better to see the truth within, the more the stories intertwine the more they align you with our uncertain future because there is no one better suited than us all.

Fleeing hunger, brutality and disease, urged on by dreams of steady income, fast food and phones, we crowded into this craft built for half as many buoyed by hope ignorant of oblivion undocumented, passing between borders on less than a library card certain it must be better couldn't possibly be worse in the end to have enough left over to send some home.

So when in desperation the captain rammed an intercepting cutter we all ran to one side hoping to jump to safety on their deck, our boat listing, tilting, rolling over and capsizing, spilling its cargo, the entire 900-volume library of us, into the freezing sea, pages flailing, clinging to their spines, the women and children's collection trapped below drowning screams and wails in silence, clawing the hull as she descended.

First a few pamphlets fluttered to the surface, then a ream of cards streamed heavenward from the catalog, fighting for the surface, bursting into bubbles, until the hold erupted in a giant belch of tiny bindings and personal belongings bobbing useless in the waves, leaving the survivors with a tale we were too horrified to share.

Slash and Burn

You may have this section of bush to farm from here to here, all the way back to that tree bring machetes and axes and hoes to clear it stack the slash in piles for burning when the fire consumes the piles and the smoke clears have your women till the ashes into the red soil watch their muscles rippling, buttocks protruding bent almost as double as the hoes they hold eager for the seed you spread so close behind them heaping fertile earth into mounds for yams and cassava rows for maize and beans to sprout when the rains come.

Keep the soil loose and free of weeds and it will bear as many harvests as the gods intend you when it grows old and toothless and the withered mounds can no longer feed you stop weeding and let it grow back to the bush it was before I will mark another section for you to clear and burn and till and sow and reap until it too has worn itself out and no longer bears for you then I will assign new ground for your old wives and virgin daughters to till and you and your sons to sow behind as our people have done for generations.

But first I must ask you to gather up containers any kind you can find and meet the others at the new road where a tanker carrying diesel has overturned and spilled its precious cargo over the tarmac into the ditches on either side the more fuel we can capture the longer we can run the generator that provides us with light at night for radio and television and DVDs and cell phone charges and air conditioning the houses of your chief.

When you have filled your containers, bring them here to fill the communal storage tank.

And I must caution you not to smoke while collecting lest we lose our entire windfall.

Mango

Giant wooden salad bowl up to its gunwales in rolling green sweetness grinds into the beach

Twin paddlers wade in grinning to hawk their fruit to tourists spread on towels

They won't sell them all here but getting a better price from the unsuspecting might cover the cost of transport

To the market in town and who knows maybe the hostel will take them all off their hands

Cool, soft and slightly sticky to the touch some so ripe their cheeks are blushing

Others so green and firm that when you strip away the peel their golden hair sticks between your teeth

Careful when you bite into a ripe one lest the juice run down your arm onto your shoes

But ripe or not no way to know if this will be the one to carry you to the Heights of ecstasy or dash you down in swollen misery choking on your own tongue

Maji ni Moja

Long after eruption turned trees into moss-shrouded skeletons, rainwater formed another crater at the foot of the volcano, a placid lake of clear water surrounded by forest and fields.

We always kept a Zodiac docked on the shore for water skiing, bass fishing, or just to get to the float for a swim to avoid wading out because of the bilharzia-bearing snails around the edge.

When they began reclaiming colonial farms my father moved north of Nairobi leaving a son behind to manage the place, to control the destiny of this soil, this water, these trees.

We always cared for our people, piping clean water into their quarters, providing medical care, school fees, an extra bag of mealies on payday to make sure no one went hungry.

The day we drove the truck down to the lake with the dogs in the back I recognized them:
two young men of uncertain ambition looking for an opportunity.

“Wait till we get to the middle before you light that up, but let’s get rid of these dogs first, they’re all over me, just chuck them over the side, they can use the exercise swimming to shore, no way they get back in once they’re wet.”

They were waiting for us at the dock before we could drop the tailgate the taller one confronted me: “Why are you washing your dogs in our water? The water we depend on for fish? The water we drink and carry back to our village for cooking?”

“Your water? This lake belongs to everyone, my friend, to you, to me, and to my dogs who are no dirtier than those kids playing in the mud on the shore.” I was doing my best to stay even, backing toward the truck.
“Why do you insult our children?”

“The lake is larger than us, ndugu bigger than my farm or your village deeper than anyone can imagine, so how can two dogs swimming make a difference?” “Because maji ni moja, water is one, the filth of your dogs spreads throughout the lake and no one can stop it.”

“Water is one means plenty for everyone.
And if you’re here to collect water where are the buckets to carry it home?
Don’t you have a standpipe in your village?” “Not us, but our mothers and sisters come here to collect water.
Again you insult us!”

“I meant no disrespect, to you or your family. Now stand aside and let me pass.” With much spitting of gravel and grinding of gears I steered the truck around them and sped off up the hill, wet dogs barking furiously from the encaged bed.

In and out of court for years after that, one trumped up charge after another until they finally wore me down.
In the end we abandoned the farm, knocked about here and there eventually settling down under where the climate suited us.

“Caravanned around the country doing a bit of this and that, ended up growing coffee again, up here in the mountains. Not an easy go of it. But that’s another story.
One more glass and time to sleep. We’ve got a big pick ahead of us tomorrow.”

*Dead and dying coffee trees surround the farmhouse, now a luxury hotel;
a nature trail rings the lake where ecotourists float canoes, and snails feed on the deflated Zodiac sunk amongst the reeds.*

Cattle Post

Wicker weaver nests hung from thorny branches like Christmas bells ringing in a new year of drought

Dust devils dance between the acacia kicking up their feet when the wind blows twists in the heat

Back half of pickup drawn by donkeys hauls 50-gallon drums from the bore hole to their enclosure

Sawtooth backbones visible ribs and hips akimbo they're already gathering at the gate hoping for some relief

Intending to Write

At the other end of Lac Léman where the lake returns to a river a dog-leg foot bridge links the soon-to-be banks of the Rhône to a tiny island inhabited by ducks and swans and a guano-crowned statue of Jean-Jacques Rousseau gazing out into the lake, pen poised, pensive as the swans and paddle boats arc round the jet d'eau at the end of the pier Indolent schoolboys gathered beneath him drinking beer from paper sacks and hurling taunts up at the old philosopher: “J. J., you old shithhead!

All you ever do is sit there in your chair looking inspired as hell but you never write a thing.” As fearless as they were foolishly ruthlessly invincible.

Convinced they had all the time in the world to write or paint or compose and still take off from their studies whenever they wanted to go cartwheeling round the globe in search of experience despite the draft and the drugs and the politics waiting to swallow them up like gentle Miguel who legend has it paddled into the middle of the lake stoned in a storm never to be seen or heard from again.

I imagine him approaching their bench a bottle in either pocket of that old brown leather jacket he used to wear and hunching over strings he'd tuned to pluck the mellow out of any anguish while I scribbled furiously in my notebook as the swans and the paddle boats arc round the jet d'eau at the end of the pier making up for lost time.

Félicitation

Now why would he say that?

Been walking the streets all night ducked in here at first light for an express and a croissant and a lean into the zinc bar to relieve the nail working its way into my left heel.

Congratulations for getting off the street?
Before the flics recognize me again and demand Votre passeport! or a carte de séjour?
Before the African sweepers roust me from my bench with their big twig brooms?

Congratulations for selecting to dodge the draft in exile?
Hitching, riding the Eurails posing as a Canadian or an AWOL airman?
Hiding in crash pads by night, in plain sight by day?

But no one was watching me.
Everyone's eyes were on the TV where the eagle had just landed, unfurled its flag and we had become the first nation on earth to put a finger on the moon.

Dimensional Shift

The businessman sitting next to me noticed my grip on the armrests.

“Your first time?”

“No, crossed over once at age ten. With my mother and sister.

The city was in two parts then, East and West.

Porter from one side struggles to lug our bags into the middle Baggage handler from the other loads them onto his cart.

Guns pointing from both sides.”

“I meant your first dimensional shift.”

“Yes. They say it’s like walking into a mirror.”

“Right. You see yourself coming toward you. Nothing unusual until your outstretched fingers disappear into the glass.”

“You’ve done this before?”

“I have business on the other side. A small shop. And family over here.”

“Doesn’t it get to you, being in one place and suddenly another?

Isn’t it hard to get used to? Doesn’t it take time to adjust?”

“The land is the same. It’s just the buildings that are different.

And the people, of course, except for those of us who can travel.

It’s like you turn sideways, and then you vanish.

Only you’re still here. Or there, actually.”

“How can you be in two places at the same time? It sounds crazy!”

“Think of it as being in the same place at the same time.

Here is the same as there, only in a different dimension.”

“I can say the words, but I just can’t bend my mind around it.”

“Fasten your seat belts and prepare for departure.

Please refrain from talking. Words may interfere with the shift.”

“That was quick! Passing through in the blink of an eye.
Everything the same yet different. Are we there yet?” “Both here and there, yes. How do you feel?” “Strangely the same. What’s all this I read about shift psychosis? Doesn’t seem to be happening to me.” “It’s more of a problem with multi-dimensional shifts. Just shifting from one dimension to another has minimal impact.” “I never understood why they need all these dimensions.” “Creating a separate dimension for us brought peace.
But then splinter groups started raining rockets down on everyone.
The only way to appease them was to give each their own dimension.
The diplomats who shuttle between them were the first to suffer.” “Makes you wonder if the psychosis comes from the shift or from the people they shift between.”
“Probably both. But I never asked. What brings you here?” “I’m on assignment. Hush hush. Article about dimensional travelers.
Why we do it and what happens to the peace if we don’t.” “Ah, a journalist. And most likely a spy as well.
Will I be reading about myself in the morning paper?” “Depends on where you pick it up. Or when.”
“All I ask is that you be kind and objective.
The shift has brought us peace. We can’t go back to the way it was before: dodging stones and bullets in the street, wondering if the person sitting beside you is wearing a suicide vest.” “Not to worry. Enemies occupying the same land, yet invisible to one another? A truly elegant solution. It’s been a pleasure.”

Clearing Bush

Behind the termite mound where we played king of the mountain stood a tangled triangle of untouched bush and after one too many noses bloodied on the mound, Uncle Bud, the house father, decided that clearing that corner of dense underbrush would be a better way for us to vent our pent up adolescent steam.

So one morning he assembled all the boys, older ones in front wielding axes and saws, us behind swinging cutlasses and weed whips, the littler boys following up with forks and rakes to drag the severed stalks and limbs into piles surging forward into the tangle singing Sunday school songs leaving an emerald wake behind.

Skinny arms and legs stained yellow and green boiled pink in the steamy sunshine we were jubilant at our progress beating back the bush good triumphing over the evil inherent in nature for the glory of God and His Personal Bodyguard protecting us from iniquity in this forsaken land when suddenly we stopped and stood stock still, tools hanging useless at our sides.

In a doll's house of twigs a wooden shape embedded with cowrie shells glared out from under a roof of wigwam palm, held us transfixed in uncertain awe. Some of the bigger boys advanced, axes raised as if to smite the Serpent before it slithered away when Uncle Bud raised a hand and said, "Let's take a break."
He left us suspended in the chlorophyll haze.

He returned with an old gardener who shook his ebony head and said "Is bad, is very bad, cannot be undone."
"But surely you do not believe..."
"Should leave well enough alone."

“But our work here is not yet done.” Though eager to complete the task, Uncle Bud deferred to the gardener’s sage advice.

A deacon in his church, the gardener’s roots extended deep into the community putting him in position to pass along to any secret priests among them news that this tiny shrine had been disturbed, yet trembling with apprehension, loath to put his father’s new-found faith to the test against the ancient forces of the forest.

We quickly raked our slash away and left the little fetish house exposed to sun and rain retreating to the dormitory for showers and a change of clothes before trooping into the dining hall for prayers and supper homework and sleep undisturbed by the distant anger of an impending storm about to rip through the trees that remained.

Ras Tanura Terminal

for Gary Snyder

Slender peninsula of sand hangs like a glottal stop in the mouth of the Gulf where a seafaring Japhy Ryder once packed bearings in line to take on bunker.
Twin pipes form a zig-zag tight rope toward tankers waiting in a tepid bath of sea water trapped under a cloudless sky thick with humidity to fill their holds with sticky sludge from the nearby refinery.

I'd often ride out on my ersatz mountain bike trunks hidden under long-sleeved tee shirt and Dockers, cut off at the knee to beat the heat and the religious police, ducking through hedges occasionally caught in fishing line bird snares left by Filipino vagrants looking for nothing more than a little protein in their diets.

Knapsack packed with snorkeling gear, I'd seek out a deserted spot on an abandoned beach once mined for sand to run away from, jog along the strand to reefs of tar-laden rock and marvel at the black marble rainbows left there by spills never reported because who cries over oil spilt in a gulf that nobody ever visits?

You could actually make out a fish or two in the sandy muck among the seaweed streamers, jellyfish, rocks and dead coral.
Never saw shark or a barracuda though a Scot who used to work suspended in a harness dangling paint cans and brushes on the platforms farther out toward the Sea Island said he'd often spot them fifty feet below circling like inverted buzzards anticipating slips.

Contractors and ARAMCO families alike inhabit this artificially crude international culture sequestered in compounds where even the water is manufactured where visions from the dunes meet the artifacts of sidestepping the industrial revolution in air conditioned offices with an undercurrent of spite for whatever it is you do behind closed doors is your business as long as you don't attract attention.

Out to sea the thickly painted container ships crawl out of this dead end gulf toward the pirate-infested waters beyond deserted but for their skeleton crews resting below the shimmering heat while on shore prerecorded prayer calls stretch between minarets over the tangle of hastily erected power lines and illegal satellite dishes of our humble encampment all watched over by those hidden cameras of benign neglect so closely connected to the thirsty world beyond our reach.

00:30

stealth Blackhawk landing on mud roof awash in death to America

DOMESTIC

In the Headlights

Steam rising from the still warm flank of the doe.

Antlers tilting quizzically, the buck licks and nuzzles her to get up, then bolts across the road to join the others.

Horried driver sobbing, stricken in the jaws of her car door as gentle strangers gesture us around.

Thanksgiving

(Video)

Thank you for punctured propane tank pinwheeling through the rapids like a loose fire hose finally lodging under our ruined bridge, spent.

Thank you
for foil of pine beetle pheromone tacked halfway up a trunk shining through the night above the waterline to remind us that we were safe.

Thank you
for muffled grind of underwater boulders stumbling over one another in the dark making sand.

Thank you
for relentless drone of dump trucks building us back up to where we were before it all washed away.

And thank you for debris-strewn brand new beach where morning deer pick their way between bleached branch and rock skull.

Follow Me

Everybody loves me.
The flagger takes the brunt, standing there with nothing but a yellow vest and a stick with a stop sign on top between him and a Panzer division of former FEMA motel moms and hitch-hiker dads, briefcase in one hand, gas can in the other, finally back in their homes now stuck in line in the canyon while we move heaven and earth for them blasting and scooping and pile driving the highway back to better than it used to be.

The flagger really would rather be one of those lollygaggers with a shovel who scoop up stray shrapnel tumbled down the fresh scree onto the roadway so he'd at least have the luxury of motion to keep his feet from freezing to the scarred tarmac.

You can smell the impatience build hear the accidental tooting of a horn as they nudge closer to one another when all of a sudden I appear leading a convoy from the other direction tuck in beside the flagger and we pretend to talk to supervisors on our radios.

Renewed hope starts a few engines as soon as I turn around, magazines and laptops are stowed in anticipation of the flagger turning his sign to Slow and following my flashers past the cones, around reclaimed roadbed and newly erected retaining walls, down into the valley for supplies, pick up the kids, and even if they have to stop again along the way for a dump truck to finish loading it'll be OK because they're already on their way past it.

Family Picnic

Father's battered tuff shed abandoned on unfamiliar sand confused with debris.

Daughter's shattered picnic table lodged under this or that bridge we're not sure where.

Mother's punctured propane tank spinning like a pinwheel hissing froth into chocolate water.

Little sister's insistence that they should have purchased flood insurance when they could.

Boots

in memory of Richard Brautigan

“You okay?”
Wind knocked out of me flat on my back in the orchestra pit seeing the poet’s concerned face looming over me

Seconds before I was jockeying around the podium for a handshake or an autograph when my boot heels slipped into the footlights and I went over

What could I do but deny any injury, pick myself up and scuttle off sideways having thoroughly humiliated myself before an idol I had somehow hoped to impress

My hopes of sharing the bottle of cheap port I had brought him dashed—luckily I’d taken it up to the podium earlier before the reading began

I never wore those boots again and made a point of keeping to myself in the audience until the day I read his body had left a lasting impression on the floor

The Guitar in Blow-Up

(Video)

I gave away all the cassettes I'll never play again hundreds in crates of wood plastic and cardboard and kept only the compact discs in their jewel cases, some thin some thick, row upon row of them though now all my music is suspended in ones and zeros on flash or spinning media, like ants in amber

I still keep a shelf of vinyl records deep in the recesses of my wiring closet they used to be the backups for my cassettes as the CDs now back up my MP3s just in case I feel the need to hold some scratchy Cat Stevens in the warmth and comfort of its album cover after all the cassettes are gone and the hard drives eventually crash

Books can also give me warmth and comfort when I touch the paperbacks I'll never read again arranged and rearranged corresponding to forgotten creases in my brain I just might need to access someday holding their spines in my palm to get the paternal feeling that I own them like the slender neck of an electric guitar before you bring it crashing down upon the amplifier

Books and records have copyrights and authors have the right to collect royalties until they die or outlive their usefulness but I can't own the ones and zeros that comprise the books upon my shelves unless I painstakingly scan each page myself (as I've already attempted for the cassettes and vinyl) or buy them back from their new digital owners and make these paperbacks my backups

The Yardbirds owned everyone in the room as they rocked and screeched to a crescendo that could only end smashed to bits on the stage for the fans to descend on dragging by the neck clawing the body dangling from the strings up from the bowels of the club into the streetlight to be dropped indifferently into the gutter when they ran on to the next great thing tangled on the roadside like a broken cassette lost, but I have the DVD and hopefully it will soon be available for streaming

The Blue

Jesus was a carpenter a common man Krishna was a cowboy out in Hindustan I'm a bit of both but I don't understand, just

What's keeping me from breaking through the blue?
How many miracles are dreams come true?
Why can't I be holy, too?

I'd climb the highest mountaintop to see the sun I'd walk the sea of Galilee with anyone I'd make myself a martyr if it could be done, but

What's keeping me from breaking through the blue?
How many miracles are dreams come true?
Why can't I be holy, too?

I've wandered as a mendicant without a name I've lost myself for hours inside a candle flame
I've gone beyond my senses but I feel the same, oh

What's keeping me from breaking through the blue?
How many miracles are dreams come true?
Why can't I be holy, too?

My kundalini's rising but it just won't peak I'll have to check my chakras for a power leak or maybe I could make it as a Jesus freak, 'cause

What's keeping me from breaking through the blue?

How many miracles are dreams come true?
Why can't I be holy, too?

I've written to the Editor to get the word He said I write the blankest verse he's ever heard I wonder why my universe seems so absurd, hey

What's keeping me from breaking through the blue?
How many miracles are dreams come true?
Why can't I be holy, too?

If I could catch a glimpse at what it's all about I'd find myself in selflessness without a doubt and take my rightful place among the most devout, so

What's keeping me from breaking through the blue?
How many miracles are dreams come true?
Why can't I be holy, too?

I've searched the ancient manuscripts for saintly quotes I've tried out every discipline and antidote I'd hate to end this song upon a sour note, but

What's keeping me from breaking through the blue?
How many miracles are dreams come true?
Why can't I be holy, too?

Drone

*You're a brain drain
You go on and on Like a blood stain.*

-Marianne Faithfull, with Tim Hardin

Gotta admit I really loved my job taking the steps two at a time into the trailer waiting for my desert eyes to adjust to the dark a wall of satellite imagery on rear projection screens my station a clutter of keyboards, trackpads, joy sticks, headgear, everything I'd ever wanted as a kid building models and playing video games.

You go on and on

We weren't just keeping an eye on the bad guys we were doing something about it; when some crazy cleric issued a fatwa, before his followers could start packing pressure cookers into backpacks we'd be on it, surveilling their every move ready to take them out the instant they move into range, or at least we were before they lost interest, lost their nerve, lost the resolve for permanent solutions to persistent problems.

You go on and on

Now I'm in business for myself, not really black ops though I still have a few leftover scores to settle more freelance consulting on an as needed basis keeping the world safe for democracy as we know it.
Delivering packages pays the bills and keeps me sharp ready to strike should any of those who refuse to go along with the measures our democratically elected legislators insist on shoving down their throats go too far.

You go on and on

Dealing out instant karma can be somewhat satisfying almost like having your own private rocket launcher during rush hour or one of those auto alarm eradicators they used to advertise on Saturday Night Live when you can be half a world away and not even hear the blast or the screams or the sirens just turn your bird around and bring her home to rain terror from the sky another day on another high value target.

You go on and on

So now how am I supposed to react to these small town vigilantes with their high-capacity magazines gone fully auto, licensed to kill my birds?
Ignore them? Or add them to my list of HVTs?
This could really get out of hand if they figure out how to track them, how to trace them back to me escalating into a full-blown shooting war drone on drone in the homeland, kill after righteous kill until justice is served or eliminated.

You go on and on

Children's Crusade

I do most of my recruiting at the arcade where they're easy to pick out, the ones who hang back from the others.
It looks like they're just texting: they're really on a whole nuther level.

I don't waste time on the fancy dressers, the tight jeans, the cute kids who talk a good game. the minute the chips are down they're on the phone to Mom and Dad.

I like the loners, the ones who think for themselves.
Harder to convince because they ask so many questions; recruiting them can drag on for days.

But if you're patient, willing to put in the effort, they'll stick around, even contribute, turning tricks no one could have expected or even predicted.

They don't complain when you lock them down in a cramped trailer somewhere in bumfuck America.
In fact they'll amaze you with some of the shit they cook up.

You can turn them loose in town and they won't run amok shoplifting and bating the locals.
Most likely they'll just hang and be waiting for you to pick them up again.

So focused and in control, no waiting around for you to explain:
I've never had a client complain.
They'll try anything and keep at it until they've got it down.

No hesitation, no preconceived notions to get in the way, no crises of conscience or qualms to distract them.
Their objective is to win at all costs with no regard for truth or consequences.

Which is why the DOD pays top dollar to get their underage asses in their control room chairs.
And it's up to us to find the most ruthless and relentless.

It's easier than getting them to join a cult or sign up for a trip to the Holy Land.
I don't envy those guys in Africa who have to use drugs and torture and teach them everything from scratch.

These kids come preconditioned to bring death and destruction on the unsuspecting half a world away, earning their scholarships the easy way, exempt from hazard pay.

Lost

Something missing?
Something I'm supposed to do?
Can't be sure
I seem to have forgotten what it was where it was Like losing track of how many laps I've swum caught up in counting strokes and making turns dangling in the ganglia of one-two-three-breathe-

Something I've lost or something I've forgotten?
Like brushing my teeth or rinsing the shampoo out of my hair I keep looking for it, wondering what it looks like or where I put it, whichever comes first.
I suppose they mean well but what the hell was I looking for anyway?

Something about pushing a button in the bunker every so often the first thing to go and the last thing to look for where could it be? Hiding under the stairs they'll never find me but what if it's somewhere else, whatever it looks like, supposing they find it first?
So what can they do to me that hasn't already happened?

Something like a shopping bag fits over your head secured with Velcro I vaguely remember the plastic tubing from a hardware store the gas grill refill somehow connected but they won't let me near the gas grill anymore
And a need for secrecy can't ask for help.

I know it was important but where do you start when you can't remember if it was something you forgot like feeding the cat, if the cat is still alive, or something misplaced like glasses hiding on your nose?
Just a fragment of imagination drawn to the strangely familiar red exit sign at the end of the hall.

Bodhisattvas Contemplate

for Tom and Gisela

Existence is suffering: Do we only escape this cycle of birth and death in cessation of suffering?

Oh, the souls!
lost along the way irretrievable, suffering, life made of pain

Oh, the aspiration! to stay with here not rise above until we all go together

Oh, the emptiness!
the reaching out the grasping fingers close upon themselves

Oh, the web of deception! that ties together every news event every commentary

Oh, the greed!
the self-interest that takes away only to add unto itself

Oh, the insanity!
the untold terror of our visions heading down the drain of consciousness

Oh, the bliss of pain!
exquisite familiar touch reuniting us with the essence of existence

Oh, the idiocy!
the stupid statements made the ridicule you heap up and wallow in

At the bottom of a well how do you do when they ask you except to say OK on your way to the unthinkable?

Does it get easier with practice or is it the same old same old over and over?

Can we go it alone or are we expected to wait politely holding the door?

How can you help them who cannot even themselves? I ask you how can you help it?

Sentient beings just short of enlightenment choke the corridors of our waiting rooms and morgues

Should we wait for them? or jump off the bus, promising to catch up with them when they reach the inevitable?

Emptiness is form is emptiness is gone gone gone beyond gone altogether begone Oh, what an awakening!

Oh, the lost souls!

The Cloud

My mother loved to fly.
The first time she flew she took rolls of photos of a silver wing, a magnificent cloud, and a glimpse of the earth below: these became known as Joan's flight photos.

She never took a lesson claimed she was no good at numbers but took advantage of every opportunity to climb into a cockpit, taste the thrill of takeoff, brace for landing, and marvel at the landscape spread out beneath her even if it was just another airliner taking her from point A to B.

As a child she'd heard that clouds were for the angels to rest on, reclining, plucking their harp strings, singing ethereal hymns for eternity.
Now that she could see both sides she knew that clouds were there for everyone, that a cloud could be a handy place to hide inside of when pursued by the ones and zeroes of outrageous fortune.

Like when it comes time to save this sliver of imagery, where does it go? Certainly not dropped onto a laptop hard drive or stick of memory but flung somewhere into the far reaches of this volatile storage unit they call a cloud where it joins with other devices in the giddy joy of barnstorming the fluffy towers of fake permanence, climbing and diving and buzzing the ground, fearlessly wingwalking into the wind, tears streaming past grinning ears, loving every minute of not knowing where you'll be next or who you'll meet or what they'll think.

Sometimes it obscures your vision when unannounced a cloud drops down and envelops you in the midst of a conversation you were trying to maintain, so, rudderless you drift in and out of visibility, on instruments yet clinging to the stick, pedaling as fast as you can, struggling to get out of going through all these things again and again.

On those occasions it helps to turn your gaze out the window to the con trails curling in the blue over rising desert thermals to remember the excitement when first you set foot inside one of these silver clouds so many years ago. Where was it you were going? Does it really matter? Destinations and events blown about, crashing into one another, forming new fantastical shapes, scattered about but somehow held together like bits of puzzle caught in a dust devil.

The last time my mother flew was in a two-seater over the mountain she could see from her care facility window when she became the cloud of ash puffing out behind the tail of the tiny plane.

No Poem Today

(read Hafez instead)

(Video)

Reclining in a tub full of no poem today, guzzling wine ensures this fool of
no poem today

My verses barely scratch the surface, except when I intend to pull off
no poem today

Well versed in the other masters, at your feet I drag up a stool of
no poem today

Better soak in the senseless bustle of bees, or drunken doves who coo of
no poem today

Even aspiring artists admit there's no coming up to the cool of
no poem today

Face it, there's really no point resisting the rule of
no poem today

Watch the cat trap a patch of sunlight and coil its tail around a pool of
no poem today

Jim, you must submit to the school of no poem today.

Not Creative

the Not Creative wildfire is currently one hundred percent contained.